Why you should prepare for your NBTs

The NBT is a fundamentally different style of assessment than what you experience / prepare for at a school level and so not practicing or preparing seems silly.

There are no “process” marks in the NBT. Your answer is either right or wrong! This puts the weight firmly on accuracy and process.

Achieving good results in assessments is not just about competence, a fair amount has to do with confidence! With good, solid, timeous preparation and practice comes confidence.

Why you should prepare for your NBTs

- The multiple choice format proves challenging for learners who haven't practiced particularly because each section of this test is timed. Learners will need to develop a new skill called deductive reasoning in order to check that they have come to the correct answer in a short period of time.
- There is no calculator allowed. Removing a calculator from a learner often causes them to stumble in the test.
- There is growing competition to get into tertiary institutions and since the NBT is often used as a placement assessment, this could be the difference between learners getting into their university of choice or not.

NBT Preparation learning streams

Different learners cope better with different learning styles and some learners need a combination of learning styles to get the optimal preparation. Learners are able to book more than one type of learning stream outlined below for reinforcement of information they are learning. Click on any of the learning streams below to learn more about that learning stream and find the right preparation fit.
